- 7 levels, all of them gameplayed. - Fantastic game concept, very bright environment - Easy controls, just drag the cursor with the mouse - Intersting puzzles. - Lost in a maze, not found. About Cyberath: I've wanted to create a game as the one featured on the cover of the book Cyberathlabs. When I decided to create a game about cyberathlabs I was hoping of simulating computer networks in the game, yet I also added a maze to the game, giving a visual impression of the real cyberathlabs, full of complex mazes and electrical cables. The game was inspired by the book "Cyberath labs" by Michal Weinstein and Jim Schoell. I created this game 2 years ago for the first edition of Cyberathlabs, and now it's time to finally publish it. The game is a clone of the NOAH game by the art team, which is based on the book Cyberathlabs written by Michal Weinstein and Jim Schoell. This game allows you to simulate a computer network by dragging cursor and wires with the mouse. You start by creating a mainframe, which will control the network. You'll have to send computers to the internet by sending commands to the network, and there's a small maze to figure out all the way. I made an agreement with Nintendo of Japan to work on a game for them based on the book Cyberathlabs, and actually released it in the store. You can download it with this page. You can find the files of this game at You can find more details about this game on the code project forum. Researcher game is a clone of the NOAH game by Michal Weinstein and Jim Schoell. Game Description: The aim of Researcher is to simulate a computer network. There are 7 levels, all of them gameplayed. You will have to connect the mainframe (manager) to the internet, and send commands to the rest of the nodes. Each node represents a computer. The mainframe is connected by a cable, and all other nodes are linked to mainframe by cables as well. You must send commands

7 In this article we will understand how to color the pixels to make them look as there are being colored. In this article we will learn how to simulate a true color image. As we know, generally, a color image contains the color of each pixel in its RGB key based. But, sometimes, the color doesn't seem to be real enough. So, we will learn how to simulate a true color image. The first block of our image is done like this: 1 =Skin(200,200) Storing it into the variable Skin. We set the background color to white. Next, we set the first pixel of the first block. This instruction moves us to y=0 and x=0. Since we use h=200 and the width of the image is 200, moving up and right to x=0 and y=0, we get the center of the image. We set the pixel we want to color to the next color. In this example, it's green. We use the syntax (249,64,200,0). This moves us to x=0, y=64, h=200, and width=200. Now, we have a simple background. But, most frequently, we don't know what color we want to use. We usually have some idea about it, for example, a background color. We want to color a specific color. For this purpose, we will use a new function. The function tells us what color to choose next, lets us create a new image and return the pointer to the new pixels. Using the built-in function PickPixel(), we place the color we want and return the pointer to the new pixel. The instruction is PickPixel(n,origin). n stands for the number of the color. We choose green. origin stands for the position we want the color to be placed. We want it to be at the center of the image. The function returns the color of the pixel we have placed next. As the final block of our image, we draw the rest of pixels with a new color. We put it in a loop. The instruction is inside the parentheses after the identifier. For example, the first time we loop the image, the color would be red and the second time the color would be green. The loop controls the order of the pixels. We get the random color inside the parentheses after the identifier.
