Photoshop still works on Mac OS X 10.5.6 or earlier. However, judging from the new CS6 demo, I would love to see the ability to duplicate layers. This would make it much easier to serve as a hub when working on some of my projects. This is probably the only reason you are not seeing my post on the Photoshop Talk forum, namely that it is a JPG or a Web based file so it is not "their" format and thus you are not allowed to post it on the forum. Related: http://forums.adobe.com/message/3467356 My only gripe is very minor. In the advanced preferences for Smart Previews, I wish it would tell me why they were failing (which I found out AFTER the preview was done). When using the LR add-on, properly executed, scanning results in a complete loss of the image data so I am also not sure of the final pixel values. I did not see any changes in image quality that made me say, "wow!" I also did NOT like the "blur" option in the Smart Previews. All it did was blur everything including the two red lines WPS gave as a guide. It did not extend the lines at all. And it did NOT blur a head or bump, just the "Dylan" Dog-like backgrounds! Hi, the latest Lightroom update included a performance boost to projects. But I haven't noticed it in my own real world workloads. Adobe made the change concerning performance a while ago. So what's the deal? I tried the new RAW Converter. I am not big on raw converters and I use LR instead. It converts dng files very painfully slow, and it eats CPU. I was up for about 6 hours converting a very large set of DNGs. The cpu goes to 100% and then leaves. So that's not good.
